Finally, classroom research deals with the effect that language instruction has on acquisition. Schneider and Bjorklund argue that young children may be taught to rehearse and this improves their performance, but this is a short-lived advantage and even with sustained training they cannot do as well as older children who rehearse spontaneously. The mental processes that underlie second-language acquisition can be broken down into micro-processes and macro-processes. This will increase the accessibility of valid and reliable measurement tools. And, by some accounts, gesture may have even been the route that language took in its evolutionary emergence.
